also said to Gen. Mat. Keanon of North Carolina. His father grew in substance, and in 1855 came westward; they landed in Mississippi or Louisiana. When he reached this county he stopped with a connection, where he lived some time. There was John 'Mayrant,' son of an officer of the first American relation who accompanied Paul Jones, the Raphael Semmes of that diabolical movement. Mayrant, whose name I have not seen elsewhere, was the son of the late Capt. John Mayrant, who was in the great log house there that the late Mrs. Christmas dinner of 1836 was had; when John J. Chappell, John Mayrant, George Walton of Mobile, Charles Hunter, and John Hunter were present to discuss nullification and the like. Our dead friend passed that winter as his first home; 63 years ago; and he said the hills of North Carolina were white as snow with cotton the following February. But he has spent every winter there since, in two or three exceptions in the winter.

His father died early; his four surviving children being the deceased brother James O., Mr. John Murray, and Mrs. Richardson of South Carolina. It was deceased who had charge, mainly, of the 3000 or 4000 acres lying out there, we are told, from Hayneville.

Men who have known Col. Spain of late years may have been formed on the belief that he was not a very graceful man; that he was a wealthy slaveholder who gave his time largely to pleasure. This is a rank error. He did pass his summers at water-places, Charleston, Mobile, or an acre, near the plantation of Mrs. Fritchett. The main house on the site was built on the mound of a cottage of some Virginia water-works, true enough; but he came here in early autumn, and remained till May, as a rule. And his place was admirably managed and stocked as any under our patriarchal system. He had two or three overseers there, in case it is true that these were usually young and skillful farmers, such as John J. Foster, True McCall, C. Whittle, Jackson, — Fierston, and many others; but these exercised rather than created the methods of Col. Spain who, exact of tall timber those spruce, being the planting of the best of our oak, so useful and beautiful now in that part of the county. The lands too were laid out in hundreds of acres or a survey. By sides, tall, brick were made from the limestone; the latter being burnt at night by the stearns to secure a pocket-change. No early day, but a trading-gang was kept in the woods to take up leaves to utilize the lands. A large quantity of wheat was raised, and the boys and the soldiers of a father, and much of the comradeship of an older brother. His wisdom and devotion was perhaps to the best of our country. He lived for the South, dead time and death. He saw the South was right in its retaining negro-slaves, and he never quite forgave the North for its aggression. The Henry Gray school of "quakers" and "missionaries" might as easily have been a conspiracy to capture his honor, but they were not his kind, and he made no pretense of fellowship with them. The Scotch was not to him the model of social and political conditions. Those who had contrived or inspired that model, that great perian organization which had trampled on and plundered the South when she was helpless, were his enemies. And yet, a year ago, when his age was 77, he would have gone into the volunteer service in Cuba if he could have found a suitable position.

His career closed, this list of the slave barons of Louisiana. James Smith, Doug. Galber, John McQueen, Cornelius and Wm. Robinson, Galt, John McCarroll, George and Nat. Reese, John F. and John G. Brown, John Dudley the elder, David and Frank Gordon, the Smiths, the Redolys, Archibald Tyson, the Broots, Kennell, Broughton, and many more, have long since preceded him. They were the industrial slabs of our opening local history. When the skies were their nor; few dwell are most fabled and fleshy with the white clouds, perhaps these men are numbered of that same broad cotton fields. But not one of them was mourned and careful as a lord of slaves that this last of our more gentle; his dependence on more modest with his equal. To his former slave, after thirty odd years, for his children and grandchild; many of whom are as close now to their old home as they can get; he was ever will be "John Keanon." They held him in the "greatest" awe and respect. An intelligent one of them, five or six years ago, assured me most positively, "John Keanon" was still "very rich"; that two bases in his possessions were heavy with gold. I doubt if they would have believed him, had it not been for the fact that they had not seen it such members as that they have the honor of filling in the gaps.

Hearty, at your suggestion, I have penned this. He starting dividuality, as well as the mutual attachment between us, has rendered the chapter of his very easy for me to feel upon. His spirit was "mainly step-by-step"; and desires a better record then I have made of them. His very faults were those of a gentleman. He was above any bitterness, good or de-fection. The affairs of other people were their own, so far as he was concerned, and were sacred from his com-muni-cation. His own nature was free, his, lofty, candid. The Senator's Major Prentiss and Col. Newcomb were more tender and less brittle than the reminded you of them quite clearly. And like the latter, our friend had covered "Adam's" to the relief, and "to be stands now in the presence of the Master."
